In “Woman Spirit,” I study women and religion in Korean and US Korean diasporic context, providing a transnational history from the Korean War to the age of K-Pop. At the intersection of Korean Pentecostalism, feminist theological movements and shamanism, I investigate how women have used these movements to seek hanpuri—healing and release from the heavy burdens of poverty, patriarchy and disease. This transpacific history of women and gender connects Korean history, world Christianity, Asian American history and US religious history. I contribute to writing Asian American women’s religious history, an underrepresented subfield of history, and I show how everyday women and migrants have contributed to the American religious landscape.*
